Regional (or site) niche modelling in conservation planning: approaches and applications. One way to better understand and conserve biodiversity is to better understand the factors that regulate biodiversity, including drivers, distribution and stability of biodiversity. In this paper we review the application of site-specific niche models to better understand patterns of biodiversity in the context of multiple conservation goals and policy. We describe the different approaches and the different types of sites that have been used, the strengths and weaknesses of different approaches, and the need for further investigation into the application of these models. We use examples of planning for biodiversity conservation, including the economic and social benefits that might be gained from increasing population densities. We give an overview of the problems that exist for very large-scale models but conclude that models of appropriate scale can be useful tools for biodiversity conservation and can support decision-makers.[The effects of Cd2+ on the arsenic-induced toxicity to Lumbricus terrestris]. The lethal effects of As (3-300 mg x L(-1)) alone or combined with Cd2+ (1-10 mg x L(-1)) on L. terrestris were assessed after 96 h exposure. The population density and the enzyme activities of alanine aminotransferase (ALT), aspartate aminotransferase (AST) and lactate dehydrogenase (LDH) in the midgut gland of the earthworm were determined, meanwhile the RNA expression of metallothionein (MT) was analyzed by quantitative real-time PCR.
