This package has been tested to be compatible with updates up to version 63.(Reuters) - The leading purchaser of hemp-based products on the U.S. market is stepping up its assault on a competing Canadian company, asserting its right to U.S. trademarks on the name "Canapa" as well as its grip on the term "hempseed." Heptofil, the newest player in the U.S. hemp-seed business, is setting up distribution to match that of its competitor Canopy Growth Corp GRHO.O, which owns the U.S. trademark "Canapa." The two men, also known as Hepto-Lemp and Hepto-Canada, both aim to be the dominant players in the highly profitable hemp-seed market. Canopy Growth is suing Hepto-Canada and its distributors for trademark infringement, Hepto-Canada said in a statement, adding that it intends to take its claims to court, though it did not reveal the potential outcome. Hemp is a form of the plant cannabis sativa with a versatile fiber and oil used in food, clothes and other products. Hemp growers are waiting for the U.S. government to lift federal bans on growing the plant, which was outlawed in the 1930s. In Canada, hemp growers have been waiting for access to federal subsidies since the 1940s. Hepto-Canada specializes in seeds and says on its website it is the largest supplier of hemp and hemp-derived cannabidiol (CBD) ingredients to the food f30f4ceada
