A: It is important to note that the Elau automation software you are using is produced by a different company to the manufacturer of your equipment. This will prevent you from installing older versions of the software onto the older hardware or, conversely, it will not permit you to run newer versions on older hardware. If you want to make your machine fully compatible with the latest software you will need to buy the latest version of the software (more than likely 24.0) and installation will be a straightforward installation procedure if you follow the installation guide and read the console for the required software on the auto run tab. The controls should also work correctly if you do this. The latest version of the software allows you to make inputs using a USB human interface device (HID) and a HID compatible device will work with the latest versions of the software. I would not recommend any of the Elau tools that are out there. Either you are using a tool that does not work or you are using a tool that has limitations of performance, accuracy and experience in programming that tool. For example: the Elau toolkit that we have used for over 20 years is no longer produced and Elau Software have no intention of continuing to produce this software nor have any intention of providing support for it. The analysis of a DNA fragment during the PCR can be done using any of several methods including visual and/or instrumental methods. See, e.g., U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,925,517; 5,804,375; 5,763,177; 5,677,152; 5,955,029; 5,753,500; 5,846,723; 6,100,998; and 6,277,573; 6,140,448; 5,972,639; 6,068,956; and 6,093,399; and Science 278:84-86 (1997). The analysis of a DNA fragment is typically performed after multiple cycles of PCR have been completed. One common type of instrument used for this analysis employs capillary gel electrophoresis. The analysis of a DNA fragment can be performed to ascertain a number of important parameters. Some of these parameters include: 1) the occurrence and size of the fragment, 2) the amount of fragment, 3) the presence of contaminants that may interfere with analysis of the fragment, and 4) the presence of multiple overlapping bands. i.
