CONTEXT11 items.Thursday, March 22, 2017 In the shadow of War, Bibi is making friends, reviving those left behind By Adi Issacharoff In early May 2002, Israelishe Pravda reported that Benjamin Netanyahu, then a 22-year-old member of Knesset, met with Shimon Peres, who was then in his seventh year as Israeli prime minister, and Yaakov Peri, who was then Israel's defense minister. The young Netanyahu listened to the former president's account of the two years he served as prime minister and what he had achieved and learned about the challenges he would face when he assumed office. Peres explained that Israel had been left to fend for itself because the international community had failed to protect the country or alleviate the hardships that the 1948 war had created for Palestinians, the refugee population, and other Arabs. >> Trying to make peace a national priority is a powerful kick in the pants Peres had discovered a few international states and other world powers who were willing to pressure Israel to make concessions, but he warned Netanyahu that the chances of achieving a peace agreement that included Palestinians were slim and that there was a danger of Israel being isolated internationally. He advised Netanyahu to utilize his close relationship with the American president, George W. Bush, to make peace a priority and pressure the Palestinian Authority to abandon its strategy of pursuing unilateral steps, especially on the issue of the demand for the right of return. Netanyahu listened attentively and promised to do his utmost to achieve a peace agreement that would be good for all the parties involved, according to the report. Last week, the young Netanyahu delivered on that promise. The last day of an official visit to Egypt, he met with Elazar Stern, a former director general of the Prime Minister's Office and a professor at Bar Ilan University. Stern told Israel's Channel 2 News that he had met Netanyahu at the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem, where he recounted to the prime minister his own meeting with Peres in 2002. Stern admitted that at the time he had been afraid to meet Netanyahu and was therefore unable to speak freely, but he noted that the former prime minister's successor, Ehud Olmert, had also had a close meeting with him and was able to speak freely. Stern warned Netanyahu that it was difficult to achieve peace, but stressed that it was Israel's top priority 570a42141b
