Advantages Disadvantages The first thing you might want to know about the use of a mouse is that it controls the movement of the pointer on the screen. The way a mouse works is very simple: the underside is an actuator, a mechanism that moves the pointer on the screen. The mouse has a number of buttons in the front which can be used to select text, press buttons and to do different other operations. It also has a scroll wheel which can be used to scroll the mouse's actuator across the screen. The mouse is connected to a computer via a cord, and is powered by a plug-in power supply which can supply a low level of electricity, and can be used in a different area, for example, to provide power to a desktop computer in a different room. As well as the main pointer, the mouse also has a status indicator, and a battery which can be used to indicate its power status. When a computer is turned on, the mouse can be connected to it and the status indicator will light up, indicating that it is in operation. A mouse also has a battery-operated infrared transmitter which sends the movement of the mouse's actuator back to the computer. The computer sends out a signal to the mouse to move the pointer, and the mouse sends a response to the computer to tell it that the pointer has moved. The computer and the mouse also communicate via an infra-red signal. It is used for providing communication between the mouse and the computer. An infrared signal uses a wave length of approximately 830nm, and the computer can communicate with the mouse by sending out a wave signal, which is translated by the mouse into a movement of the pointer on the screen. A mouse consists of a number of parts, including the actuator, a mouse ball which the actuator moves on, the internal parts of the actuator which move the pointer across the screen, the battery, a switch that powers the mouse, a receiver and the infrared transmitter. The main parts of a mouse are as follows: Actuator - This is the mechanism which actually moves the pointer on the screen. Mouse Ball - This is a rubberized ball which the actuator moves over and is attached to a mechanism. Internal Parts - These are the parts that move the pointer on the screen. Battery - This provides power to the internal parts, and provides
