Q: How to do a reverse geocode using planet-osm-developer in Android? I want to do a reverse geocode in my Android app using the following URL: 13.54986920, 52.12345640, 13.56397120 I've tried using the following class, but I always get an exception which says that this function doesn't exist. I've read somewhere that the URLs for these different functions (might change, but can't find any information about this. public class ReverseGeocoder { public String reverseGeocode(String coordinate) { try { HttpGet httpGet = new HttpGet(" 13.54986920, 52.12345640, 13.56397120"); HttpClient httpClient = new DefaultHttpClient(); HttpResponse httpResponse = httpClient.execute(httpGet); HttpEntity httpEntity = httpResponse.getEntity(); BufferedReader reader = new BufferedReader(new InputStreamReader(httpEntity.getContent())); StringBuilder stringBuilder = new StringBuilder(); for (int i = 0; i

What's New in the?

Brahmos ASH 25 The Brahmos ASH 25 is an Indian supersonic cruise missile which was made public by Brahmos Aerospace Ltd in April 2019. The missile reportedly has a speed of more than Mach 2. It is capable of hitting the target within less than a minute of launch. A single missile can destroy a target of with a maximum range of. The Brahmos ASH 25 is propelled by a combination of thrust vectoring and ramjet propulsion, giving it supersonic speeds. It can achieve Mach 2 speeds within 4 seconds of release. The missile's design is derived from BrahMos-II, with two principal innovations: its wide-body shape and the splitting of the rocket booster, allowing the missile to rapidly decelerate and transition into a high-speed cruise. The missile is canisterized and uses an inertial guidance system. It can be integrated with the BrahMos NG (Next Generation) cruise missile, as well as the BrahMos SL (Supersonic Cruise Missile) and SM (Subsonic Cruise Missile). Development The missile was first unveiled in an April 2014 demonstration by Brahmos Aerospace at IHI Corp., Japan. A working prototype was tested a couple of years later, and full scale development began in 2016. Since then, the missile has been tested extensively in the Indian Navy's integrated test range facility. On 27 December 2018, BrahMos Aerospace delivered a missile to India's Naval Armament Research Establishment for integration to the BrahMos NAMROS-1. In a presentation in August 2019, Brahmos Aerospace Ltd stated that the ASH 25 was undergoing full production and was scheduled to be operational by 2023. Design The missile's design is derived from the BrahMos missile. However, there are two principal innovations: the missile's wide-body shape, and the splitting of the rocket booster, allowing the missile to rapidly decelerate and transition into a high-speed cruise. The missile's low-drag wide-body design and the splitting of the rocket booster allow it to have supersonic cruise speeds that are almost ten times as fast as the previous version. The missile has been re-engineered to remove the missile's earlier design failures, and the Brahmos Aerospace Ltd, which is developing the missile on the Indian Navy's request, expects it to be fully operational by 2023. Operational history In October 2017, India's Navy revealed that the missile
