Q: Which type of Flash video would be used for car videos? Which type of Flash video would be used for a video of a car changing gears? For example, if it's a video of someone turning a switch that sets the car to a different gear, what type of Flash video should be used? I know the answer should be "FLV" but I'm not 100% sure. A: What you're describing is probably the format of a GIF animation, also known as an "Animated GIF". The.GIF format is a compression method for animation files, so it's probably what you were thinking of as your answer. I have no idea whether there is an "official" flash format for this, but there doesn't appear to be a problem as long as it's in the GIF format. EDIT: GIF is basically a snapshot of an animation every X frames, where X is usually around a 1-7, depending on quality. Then it is compressed, and a link is created that causes the browser to actually "play" the animation on demand, showing a snapshot of the animation at the current moment. The animation speed is hard coded into the file format, not user-defined (unlike flash). GIF is simple, but is horribly prone to transmission problems, and so not really popular outside of digital image distribution. Here is a tutorial on how to do this in Flash. NEW YORK (CBSNewYork/AP) — A married couple planning to wed next week has had the wedding ceremony hit by a New York City subway accident – and they say an emergency childbirth may have played a role. With a total of seven people injured in the crash – including a pregnant woman, her husband and their six-year-old daughter – all have been released from the hospital, NYPD said Saturday night. "They're a fairly healthy family, and they're out and about with the family," said Kim, not using her last name. "I guess they're doing pretty well." But while everyone has been released from the hospital, she said the family's emotional healing hasn't started yet. "It's pretty horrible," she said. "It's not like I'm traumatized – I'm just sad for the little girl

Launch angle as an independent prognostic factor in patients with fractures of the intertrochanteric region of the femur treated with dynamic hip screw: an analysis of the National Hip Fracture Database. In a search for independent prognostic factors that predict surgical complications and the outcome of patients with femoral neck fractures treated with dynamic hip screws (DHS), we analyzed the National Hip Fracture Database (NHFD). Patients with femoral neck fractures were identified from the NHFD and an additional cohort of patients were enrolled into a prospective study. Univariate and multivariate analyses were performed in patients with fractures of the intertrochanteric region (n = 3003). Our results revealed that good outcome correlated with an increase of the supine position (odds ratio = 0.93) and the depression-rest elevation maneuver (odds ratio = 1.42) and with an improvement of the Charlson Comorbidity Index (odds ratio = 1.36). Age, sex, body mass index, nutrition, smoking, alcoholism, mechanism of injury, fracture side, fixation of the iliac crest, preoperative hemoglobin (Hb), osteoporosis, dislocation, American Society of Anesthesiologists score, and intraoperative hypotension did not correlate with a good outcome. High-energy and low-energy femoral neck fractures, wound complications, the frequency of clinical and/or intraoperative complications, the number of procedures, the implant loosening, and implant failure did not correlate with a good outcome. Fracture position, originally considered a prognostic factor, failed to correlate with outcome. An increase of the anteversion angle was an independent prognostic factor for postoperative infection, postoperative thromboembolic events, and the frequency of technical complications. Furthermore, an increase of the elevation angle was an independent prognostic factor for postoperative medical complications, time to independence, pain relief, a good outcome, and implant failure. In our study, surgical complications correlated with anterior fracture position and a low increase of the elevation angle. Patients with subtrochanteric fractures benefit more from the depression-rest elevation maneuver and from an increase of the supine position. For the majority of patients, the final position will depend on the magnitude of the depression-rest elevation maneuver.Observations made at night: the dark side of nursing research.
