How best to keep a single user from accessing another's private data? - jgrahamc I know at the moment this implies not trusting anything (other than the oauth system at the other provider) and the idea of having to store their credentials in-memory or as a file. Are there any other approaches people are using in this situation? ===== omouse You can use the OAuth credentials given to you by your service provider to authenticate users on your end. I did it with Twitter, but it's possible with Facebook and Google as well. ----- oimama Probably you should have read up on per-client authentication and authorization. Google is well-known to be an excellent resource for that. ~~~ jgrahamc Yes I have and this is the way I would go, but I was hoping that there were solutions that were more generic and less tied to providers? ~~~ oimama I don't see any. When you say "that were more generic" you just mean you want them to work without having to care about any provider, or you want them to work without trusting any provider? I don't know, sorry. ~~~ jgrahamc You could argue that in the design that Twitter provides. All they require is a single number (a second factor) and a single token. They assume that you trust them. I'm sure similar schemes are available to others. ~~~ oimama So, you do want them to work without having to care about any provider, and you want them to work without trusting any provider. Hmm... You might need to trust the providers themselves (and possibly the authentication server). I'm not sure how you can do that... perhaps you just would not expose the service to untrusted clients.
