The last part of the Karelian War Campaign for the DCS: A-10C Aircraft Carrier Russian Warships in World of Tanks. This part is about the Finland-Sweden War. Everyone's favorite "worship band" at first glance is more than a little bit disheveled. The more you see of them the more you realize why. The Brothers Rice have been awake for a week. "We've been pretty much playing outside nonstop for the last week," lead singer Matt is saying as he sits with his back and shoulders resting on the wall of the Eider grounds, a festival complex that hosted ACL (all in L.A.), Shaky Knees, and just about every music festival the Triangle ever had. "Hopefully, we'll have some time to go over some tunes tonight." He's busy trying to put his flak jacket away for the night while talking on his iPhone with his brothers, Clint and Clint ("the drummer") to hammer out a bass line. You see, the Brothers Rice are well-known for their unpredictable antics. Since their inception in 2012, the band has put on several surprise shows that are live streamed from a hidden location on YouTube. They also like to do an occasional black out where they cover their rehearsal space in black so as to not give away the whereabouts of the trio to the outside world. This year the brothers went full out with the secret, releasing their music with little explanation as to where and when. "On Twitter, we were just constantly tweeting 'Here's our secret page. Come and join us.' We posted secret Facebook fan pages. We put up a couple of secret tickets, secret fan art and stuff like that. And then we just kind of let things build up," Matt says. "We'd roll something else out and we'd keep that under wraps. We would post about the tour and give a little bit of information and then just keep rolling out more. It was just too much fun not to keep it going." As they line up the popular jam band behind their knees, they start talking about their upcoming tour. Touring while your

By Jonathan Fildes Science reporter, BBC News, Seattle Image copyright SPL Image caption Armed with newly designed genes, scientists hope they will be able to engineer a microbe which can make a fuel By arming genetically modified microbes, the team hopes to create a new kind of fuel. The team spliced genes from photosynthesis into the species commonly used for genetic engineering, known as Escherichia coli (E. coli). But the new species, known as Synechococcus elongatus, did much more than photosynthesise. It also made a type of organic chemical known as bacteriochlorophyll, containing nearly twice as much energy-rich carbon as does a normal plant. "We've been using this bacterium to produce a lot of natural products," said Dr Adrian Savage at the University of Adelaide, Australia, who is a lead author on the study published in the journal Nature. "It's been the workhorse bacterium for years and years," he told BBC News. "It's what bioengineers have been using for basic metabolite screening, for biological instrumentation, for studying the mechanisms of the cell, when you want to see something in a cell that you're not going to find by just looking." Flexible Bacteriochlorophyll is the first example of a new kind of photosynthetic pigment discovered at US lab The scientists took E. coli and adapted its genes, known as Photosystem I and Photosystem II, to make bacteriochlorophyll. The team made the discovery by accident. The team found that photosystem II would start making bacteriochlorophyll, he explained, "when it was under sufficiently high light stress." High light stress is a sort of biological, and quite literal, camera flash. And then, the researchers realised that they could make bacteriochlorophyll in much greater quantities when their biological camera flashes were combined with the bacterial sensor for oxygen, known as the FNR protein. Dr Savage's team "reverse engineered" the bacterium's genes to make it produce significantly more bacteriochlorophyll than any previous example. The new pigment "is much better at storing energy," he
