Kampala, Uganda — The doors to the new Ebola Treatment Centres (ETC) in Bumba and Falaba in Sierra Leone will open in a few days. The country's first — and now ninth – ETC is a three-star accommodation facility. The second nine are repurposed from what were once hotels where Ebola patients could be kept during the 21-day incubation period. As soon as the Bumba ETC opens, the wards will be ready, the facility manager, Colonel Clement Tom, tells IRIN. The Bumba and Falaba ETCs are in the east of the country, a region not known for its hospitality or hospitality-related businesses. So why did the government build them in Sierra Leone's third-largest city and its worst-affected 0cc13bf012

A common PCL document is the IBM Printer Command Language, or "PCL". The PCL language is described in a publication entitled PCL Language Reference, version 6.5, pp.1-123, published September 1986 by the IBM Division PC Division of the Armonk, N.Y. for use with the PCL Xerographic WorkCentre printer, which is manufactured by the IBM Corporation. The PCL language is further described in later editions of the aforementioned publication, including PCL Language Reference, version 6.5, pp. 124-195, published November 1995 by the IBM Corporation. The PCL language is not limited to the IBM Xerographic WorkCentre printer. The PCL language is also used with the IBM ESC/P printer system, which is a general purpose, programmable electronic printing system for use in conjunction with a personal computer. The PCL language is also used with other Hewlett-Packard printers, Canon printers, and other printers manufactured by other companies. One skilled in the art will appreciate that other languages have the capacity to print a document on a printer, and are not limited to the IBM PCL language. A typical PCL document includes a text header containing information about the origin of the document and the like, and a text body
