The accuracy of digital radiography in the detection of small carcinomas of the mandible. A retrospective analysis of the ability of periapical and bitewing radiographs to detect small carcinomas of the mandible was performed. Carcinomas in 21 cases were either grossly or microscopically verified. Each jaw was examined radiographically by three periapical and three bitewing films. Five observers, two radiologists and three doctors with little or no prior radiographic experience, ranked the radiographs in order of the probability that the radiograph demonstrated a malignant lesion. The order of rank was compared with the order of verification for each observer using the paired t test. Each observer detected a greater percentage of small carcinomas using periapical films and detected larger lesions using bitewing films. The mean accuracy rate (+/- SD) for detecting malignancy from periapical and bitewing films was 80.4% +/- 18.2% and 96.4% +/- 7.5%, respectively. Of the two radiologists, one was significantly more accurate in his detection of malignancy than his colleague. There was no significant difference in the accuracy of any observer in the detection of small malignancies using periapical films.
