think you could escape?" response on my Creature Companion? I'm building my first adventure for City of the Fallen Kings, and it really depends on my DM and the players. In my game, they have a very small group and there is potential for a night adventure. The plan is that they're trapped underground, by a lot of things including a stone giant. (City of the Fallen Kings can be found here.) The target is located in a natural cavern (the other entrances are blocked by doors). This gives them a nice small but protected space where they can regroup. As part of the adventure, there are 3 things my players want to do; Open the cave the giant is living in. Find a way out of this cave.
Make sure the giant knows they're here. The cave is currently surrounded by goblins and a half-dozen level 8 (1st) zombies. The group has a wizard with training in encounter making, and the DM is keeping him at 0th level as a backstop. My question is, is there any magical way to call the giants attention, "Did you really think you could escape?" or "You should have stayed in the dungeon with us." or something along those lines? All of the options I can think of are characters themselves calling it to the giants attention which won't work here because they don't even know where the giant is located. So what other options do I have? Are there spells, magic items, spells out of their level range or items specific to this situation? Is there anything in the Pathfinder Bestiary, or perhaps the DMG? The monster book is not the focus for this question, but if there are no other options, that book would be the next best thing. A: What about a badger? In the Monster Manual, page 324, there's a section titled "Crushing the Castle:
