Plugging the Drain Two versatile home water-purification systems, a backup plan for a surge in demand, and an invention that cleans water with leaching By MITCHELL TRISTMAN A few years ago, the U.S. Department of Agriculture released its biennial estimate of household food purchases. Amidst all the foodie horror stories and the family van vat-ing leftover barbecue sauce, it seemed like a bit of a time-wasting, industry-changing number. Last year, the USDA said that Americans spent $1.34 trillion on food, an amount greater than the gross national product of the entire planet in 1973. Around the same time, during a keynote speech at the International Water Conference in Cape Town, South Africa, more than a decade ago, Peter Gleick, director of the Center for Science and Democracy at the Pacific Institute in Oakland, Calif., made a prediction that may have ultimately come true. In his speech, he predicted that water conservation would be at the top of the global agenda by 2020. We might have come close, but years passed without much of a dent in the water squandered daily by just about everyone. It was the drought that the planet hadn't seen in a millennium that finally thrust water conservation into the public consciousness. It was the drought that put the Global Water Partnership at the center of the Clean Technology Development Program, the U.S. government's $200 million effort to help Africa leapfrog its water woes. (Copenhagen, Denmark, is calling for a $7 billion investment in research and development over the next several years to address many water crises.) The traditional news media barely gives water a mention, but the subject is on everyone's mind. In the United States, water shortages have become commonplace, and government agencies and nonprofits are scrambling to meet the challenges. But the public may not have begun to see a problem until much, much later, in the era of climate change, when extreme heat, drought, and floods could alter the way we live as dramatically as nuclear weapons changed the character of the Cold War. While water conservation could help, in most cases, it isn't a magic bullet. With climate-change-driven droughts becoming more common, we'll need more complex systems to safeguard the planet's water. One of those systems is the Recharge Your Ecosystem, Recharge Your Life system,

What's New In?

This invention relates to an improved case for supporting and storing photographic photosensitive materials, and more particularly to a case for supporting and storing a roll of photographic photosensitive material, such as, a roll of film for photographs, a roll of color film for motion pictures and a roll of microfilm, and a roll of contact printing paper. A roll of photosensitive material is conventionally wound into a cylindrical shape, and is used to record images or letters of a large number of people, using a projection, display device such as a slide projector or a contact printer, or for other purposes. The photosensitive material is wound into a cylindrical form and is usually stored in a case made of a comparatively rigid material such as a wooden box. However, when the photosensitive material is stored in the case described above, there is a problem in that the photosensitive material is likely to move in the case because the case is made of comparatively rigid material. When the photosensitive material is continuously wound into a cylindrical shape to form a roll, the photosensitive material is often moved in the case because the photosensitive material is thin. Therefore, it is necessary to provide a means for preventing the movement of the photosensitive material in the case. JP-A-02-153404 proposes a method for retaining photosensitive material by providing a filler of low elasticity to the lower portion of a case to retain the photosensitive material against the case. However, since this case provides only an elastic filler of low elasticity, when the case is urged in the direction of extension of the case, a gap is formed between the case and the photosensitive material, thereby reducing the strength of engagement. Thus, this case is problematic in that the photosensitive material is easily retracted from the case. JP-A-05-179807 proposes a method for retracting the photosensitive material by providing an elastic material on the upper surface of the case in a cylindrical shape. In this case, the elastic material makes engagement between the photosensitive material and the case difficult. In addition, this method has a problem in that the elastic material may be deformed, thereby allowing the photosensitive material to be retracted from the case.
