Yesterday (May 7th), Taiwan-based LAN Airlines launched its first direct flight from Taipei to Toronto. It's the first time Taiwan's bustling capital city has connected directly to Canada's biggest city, and the introduction of this new route is being heralded as a major milestone in Taiwan's ever-expanding international air industry. But it's not just new routes that's drawing the attention of Taiwanese businesses. A growing number of Taiwanese companies are looking beyond the mainland for new opportunities to tap into Canada's vast markets. By offering new routes or investing in expansion, Taiwan is aiming to secure the best possible flight paths to Canada, which offers an opportunity for Taiwan businesses to penetrate new markets. In the past, new routes have included Vietnam and Singapore, but the Taiwan-Canada market is proving to be an increasingly enticing prospect. Taiwan has six major airports with international connectivity — Taipei, Kaohsiung, Hsinchu, Taichung, Tainan and Ilan — but flights to Canada are only available from Taipei. So it's easier for Canadian businesses to connect to Taipei than it is for Taiwanese companies to connect to Canada. To bridge this gap, Taiwan's current major airlines are making greater efforts to establish an active and effective presence in Canada's market. Air Canada recently partnered with Hainan Airlines to sell tickets from Toronto to Chinese cities, while EVA Air signed an agreement with King Air that allows it c9d1549cdd programme. Teddy topping the scoreboard by a head. After a 0.4 second nilfice victory, I moved onto my other general obsession: polarisation. Since Mike Aldridge carried it out back in May 2014 I've held several arguments with some film theorists and book reviewers and one of them was Bill Buford who I think had the best response to it I've ever seen; but that's probably because one day I was tearing off his nutsack at polarity. Anyway, the point is I'm addicted to theories and Bill Buford responded to myself here: How These Histories Are Made What part did historians have in shaping the case of Pinochet? When I first read about Pinochet at university, a few years ago, it took me months to find a satisfactory explanation of this event. It was the idea that at least some of the Spanish journalists who had participated in the coup d'état had received their orders from the State Department. The State Department had placed agents in the CIA to put out this message: "Remember, before you start with with the, you shouldn't, you have to check with the U.S. government. We are putting the pressure on the target country to make sure that we know what's going on. So if you get a report that, say, there are some coups going on in Chile, don't believe it, you've got to go to Washington first." In other words, they said, "don't go out and do a fuckin' coup!" Isn't that what we want out of our news media? — Tom Hart, "This Is Not History" Even the Polish prison which held General Akrep, the Soviet KGB and CIA agent whose team carried out the first shoot-to-kill mission of Pinochet's regime and murdered General Prats, got in the way of prevent all of that. A journalist, Zbigniew Brzezinski, went to the prison and tried to see General Akrep. The Soviets were furious. They sent a delegation to Poland to demand an explanation; they were convinced that the best way to deal with General Akrep was to shoot him as had happened with others in the past. "If he was killed in prison, it would look bad,

The new protein synthesis inhibitor pactamycin induces apoptosis of T cell-dependent lymphomas in vivo. A new agent, pactamycin, was developed to inhibit protein synthesis in organisms. We report that pactamycin can induce apoptosis of mouse T cell-dependent lymphomas in vivo. Pactamycin is rapidly absorbed after i.v. injection into mice. When pactamycin was administered (i.v.) to mice at 25 mg/kg, LD50 was 1.5 mg/kg and the rate of disappearance from blood was 2.3 micrograms/ml h. It was shown that pactamycin induces a rapid, profound, dose-dependent inhibition of protein synthesis in the blood cells of mice. After i.v. injection, pactamycin accumulates in all of the
