Often times, the strip is manufactured by roll forming a metal blank having a desired cross-sectional configuration. Frequently, the cross-section is double-walled wherein the walls of one cross-section are of a different height than the walls of an adjacent cross-section. For example, the walls of one cross-section might be of a greater height than those of the adjacent cross-section and such a configuration permits a user to place bedding material within such a bed without a change of the height of the bed. As another example, double-walled beds may be provided having first and second bedding material layers with the inside surfaces of the first layer being of a greater height than the inside surfaces of the second layer.Biliary tract function in patients with liver diseases and hepatocellular carcinoma. This class uses other classes which also implement InterfaceA. public class ClassA : InterfaceA { private ClassB _classB; public ClassA(ClassB classB) { _classB = classB; } } Now suppose I have another class (i.e. ClassB), which has an internal constructor (i.e. internal ClassB()), which takes a parameter. All the classes with an internal constructor are members of another class. public class ClassB : AbstractClass { private ClassA _classA; public ClassB(ClassA classA) { _classA = classA; } } It would seem that I need to provide a public parameterless constructor to the class which has a public internal constructor, and I cannot derive from any of the concrete classes. My question is, is there a better way for me to share constructors than by giving everyone a public parameterless constructor? I was thinking about defining this class: public class AuxiliaryConstructor : InterfaceA { private ClassB _classB; public AuxiliaryConstructor(ClassB classB) { _classB = classB; } } and then public class ClassB : AuxiliaryConstructor, InterfaceA Does this seem reasonable? A: This seems reasonable, but you might want to give the constructor protected to avoid it being used directly. protected ClassB(ClassA classA)
