Inducing a mental composition is the mother of true poetry: I differ from Aristotle in this, that I do not agree with him that the poet is a sophist, but I agree with him that he is an inducer.'If you are secure of any great power, and yet want to prove your opinion, you will not doubt that power on the authority of others; if your hypothesis is weak and you take it upon yourself, you will not be secure of its truth, until you prove it yourself; if you want to secure a proof, you must think of something better than what you want to prove, and this is the only way to teach others to argue against the authority of others, or to secure your own conviction. We are the same with regard to virtue, when we are concerned with the proof of its truth. If we prove it by paying court, we do it without sufficient reasons, or besides, from ill. We may prove our own virtue by personal experiences, the best and only result of which is to arouse ourselves and incite us to be more virtuous: that when once we know that we are worthy of it, we become so. The proof by comparing is the best of all, and if we do not possess the greatest power, we may still make them pay with it. If you compare yourself with any of the great men of the past, you find that you are much below them. Thus you might think you know the truth, but you will not be secure of it, if you have not yet compared yourself with all the others. You have not said who has been just or unjust, etc. You will tell your wife and parents. But all these efforts are useless: the comparison is made that you may know all the others. The whole is sufficient to make you cease to judge of it. We may praise or blame the imperfection of others, that is to say, that they are known to be imperfect; we may prove that we are then not imperfect; but we cannot conclude that we are then to be perfect. If we reason by ourselves, we often do not know our opinion, but it is the evidence and cause of truth. If we reason from others, we know what they are and by what nature they are, and we seldom know our own. Logic is the mother of all science and it is a e79caf774b
