The food born bacteria Bacillus subtilis can rapidly produce 'killer' molecules as part of its natural defence against pathogenic microbes. However, understanding how this is done and how the damage to the cell progresses is a challenge. Healthy intestine Marisa Azzoni at the University of California, San Diego and colleagues developed a method to track single bacteria in the digestive tract of live mice. They employed a technique called Single-Cell RNAseq to measure the transcriptional activity of about 5000 B. subtilis cells, and found that about half of the cells used the same transcriptional profile of cells killing other microbes. This half group might become the "killer cells" because their activity was triggered by detecting damage. A cell that was killed by a pathogenic bacterium had its genome fractured in thousands of places. This breakage marks the cell as dead and had little to do with whether the cell is a killer or not. Could be programmed The dead cell's transcription profile looked more like the cells. Bacteria and cells don't know each other's identity, and
