Sun 2nd Feb Credit: Robert Snevily On 4th March 2017, over 50 children from seven under-resourced schools, were invited to come and make their own "Stei" from sea shells collected at a local beach. Beyond the artistic impact of the creation of a 16 x 16 cm "Stei", the children were not only able to see, listen and feel the connection between their work and the environment, they were also given a scientific tour around the local wetlands, including a lesson about the ecology of the area and a guided tour by Einsteins, an Earth science librarian at the National Maritime Museum. This unique collaboration between The Nature Conservancy (TNC) and iNaturalist came together in response to the ever-growing need for ways to connect with and be inspired by nature in schools. Unlike most nature experiences for children, they provided access to the incredible wealth of knowledge stored in the community of Einsteins and the Marine Biologists at the National Maritime Museum. It was a perfect example of how, when TNC works with iNaturalist, the collaboration creates more than just an online project –
