MotiveWave Ultimate Edition 6.4.2 Windows. crack.rarEffects of polyunsaturated fatty acid dietary enrichment on early-life stress in juvenile chickens. Chickens from a commercial hatchery were given perinatal dietary enrichments of either oleic (18:1 n-9, group A) or linoleic acid (18:2 n-6, group B), to examine the effects of early-life enrichments on indices of stress responsiveness, neuroendocrine function, and behavioral sensitivity in later life. Groups A and B had similar growth rates, body weight, and basal plasma levels of corticosterone. Plasma cortisol levels did not differ between groups in response to stress. However, the baseline levels of corticosterone were significantly increased in the cortical tissues of group B birds. The functional activity of hypothalamic corticotropin-releasing hormone (CRH) neurons was significantly reduced in group B birds. Behaviors in a sucrose-water choice task were not affected by the early-life dietary enrichments. Early-life dietary enrichments can therefore influence basal levels of corticosterone with deleterious effects on CRH neuron function, but these findings did not affect behavioral sensitivity.using System; using
