DownloadÂ .The researchers worked with the Harvard-led Sustainable Food Lab and the Good Food Institute. The resulting apps provide tips, recipes, take-action features and other content to help people find cheaper, organic, locally grown and sustainable food. "We decided on these four examples that are needed for people to have options in their stores and restaurants," said Jill Friedman, a professor of food studies at Tufts and the Harvard-led Sustainable Food Lab. The four apps, all free, include recipes and nutrition information for a number of different plants, such as pole beans, squash and kale. Consumers can save recipes to their phones, but other users will have to find them on the Internet. The "House Roots" app allows users to search the market by neighborhood or by a number of different factors, like whether the farmer is certified organic. The researchers believe that it is important that farmers, grocery stores and restaurants should help to change consumers' food habits and offer healthy food that is more affordable and sustainable. However, they caution that poor nutrition may be more prevalent among lower-income populations, which can be rooted in unhealthy eating habits or access to nutritious foods. "We know that people in low income neighborhoods have a higher prevalence of diet-related diseases, and it's almost like there is a dietary apartheid in that some neighborhoods are getting more nutritious food but other neighborhoods are getting less," said Friedman. The researchers are now in the early stages of testing their apps with the Cambridge community, part of a joint project between Tufts and the Boston Public Health Commission to promote health and increase access to healthy food at three different locations in Cambridge. They are still in the design phase of the project and have not discussed their full plan for implementation. "We want to have as many people in the community as possible downloading the apps, but we also want to have conversations with them about how this is going to influence their food choices," said Vasudha Narayanan, director of the Harvard School of Public Health, who is leading the initiative. The researchers created the apps in collaboration with Bioversity International, which seeks to increase the use of sustainable, food-secure strategies to achieve agricultural development 0cc13bf012
