What do you do when the woman you love and respect the most is on the same side of an issue that you despise, but agrees with you on another issue where you disagree? Well, what do you do when it's particularly difficult because the issue she agrees with you on is the most important to her? One that's filled her with intellectual pride and her political passions, and that her conservative mother and liberal father would never see eye to eye on? This is the situation I found myself in recently, and it proved to be a difficult and uncomfortable place to be. It was one of those situations where I was struggling to maintain my support of a controversial candidate while my significant other felt compelled to stand beside someone I wouldn't have considered supporting. Advertisement - Continue Reading Below And in the end, I had no choice. I couldn't stand by a position that I believed to be so fundamentally wrong. As an African American Republican, I've been doing my best to support Mitt Romney for president. His position on immigration, on education, on the Supreme Court, on the economy, on basically everything else is the exact opposite of what I believe, but he supports those values with an intensity that moved me. And so I stood there as my wife of nearly 18 years stood beside President Barack Obama — that person who, after all these years, has never supported us, our family, or our values — while I thought about how I could possibly support Romney in the face of such a betrayal. And I realized that for me it was nearly impossible. I didn't want to fight and argue with her. Nor did I want to lose her. I wanted to respect her, even if I disagreed with her. I wanted to hold on to our relationship and our marriage, which had gone through so many ups and downs and never been a stranger to political disagreements. So I swallowed my pride and said nothing. I didn't have to. In the end, my wife couldn't do it. She couldn't stand beside someone who didn't support the values she had spent her life defending. She could put aside some differences on this specific campaign to save the marriage. But if there was a more important difference between the two candidates to her, well, she couldn't really stand for someone who didn't support those values. And so with tears in

Image copyright Getty Images Travel company First Choice has said it is in talks with potential investors to sell itself. In a trading update, it said it was in talks with unidentified "strategic and financial investors" about a possible sale. Meanwhile, revenues at its flights business are up more than 6% so far this year, but First Choice said it was not "highly confident" about the outlook for 2021. The company's shares were 3% lower at 569p at 12:31 BST. It also said its chief executive, Caroline Thomson, would leave in February, a move which will be effective from 1 April. But it said the transition, which would involve a "comprehensive search for a new CEO", would not result in any change to its strategy. Under First Choice's current strategy, it aims to keep its low fares and the customer loyalty programme, Club First, which is similar to Virgin and BA's MileagePlus. It will also try to pick up a "significant minority stake in a highly profitable digital brand" in 2021. Mr Goodwin said: "Our future now depends on identifying the right strategic and financial investors who share our long term ambition of a well balanced strategy that creates shareholder value, recognises the investment we have made in improving the levels of service at our core brands, and enables us to invest in what we believe are valuable strategic assets." The firm added that its joint venture with Thomas Cook, Tui, had recently won a 10-year licence from the Civil Aviation Authority to operate in the discount off-peak leisure market, which it said would add £150m in additional revenues to its existing business. First Choice previously ran Aer Lingus, which was merged with its parent in 2007. Thomas Cook was taken over by First Choice - the firm's joint venture with the Indian, Mauritius-based Tata Group - in 2007. The present invention relates to polymeric compounds that are useful as a component of plastics, paints and inks, and as a surface modifying agent for inorganic surfaces. Polymethyl methacrylate is a polyester having widespread applications in commercial products. As a result of its chemical stability, wear resistance, mechanical strength, impact resistance, low flammability, and good optical properties, this material has found widespread use in the manufacture of a wide variety of products. Polymethyl methacrylate exhibits excellent bondability with other polymers, metals
