Chlorobenzene-induced cytotoxicity and mitochondrial membrane potential changes in HEp-2 cells. Chlorobenzene is a recognized human carcinogen, yet its mechanism of action is not well known. In the present study, we investigated the effects of chlorobenzene in the HeLa cell line, as a first step in the elucidation of its mode of action in mammalian cells. In this model, chlorobenzene exerted a growth-inhibitory effect at concentrations above 10mM, and at 30mM the cells were almost completely inhibited. The effect was also observed in a short-term test, where the cells were exposed for 24 h to 10mM chlorobenzene. Chlorobenzene also increased the cell membrane permeability; this effect is suggested to be involved in the growth-inhibitory effect of the compound. It was also observed that chlorobenzene induced the release of lactate dehydrogenase (LDH) from the cells, while the mitochondrial membrane potential changes in the mitochondria were quite different from those induced by the classical pro-apoptotic agents, and the compound did not induce the mitochondrial DNA degradation that takes place in other models. We believe that chlorobenzene is an important compound in the study of cellular toxicity, not only as a model agent but also because it is common in our environment.The present invention relates to a novel process for the production of polyolefins of narrow molecular weight distribution. More particularly, it relates to a process for the production of polyolefins of narrow molecular weight distribution by reacting in a gas phase at least one olefin with at least one catalyst containing magnesium halide. Narrow molecular weight distribution polymers are of particular interest for certain applications such as injection molding, since narrow molecular weight distribution polymers have lower viscosities than the same polymers having broader molecular weight distribution. Therefore, narrow molecular weight distribution polymers are easy to process. Hitherto, there have been various attempts to improve the molecular weight distribution of polymers. For instance, it is known to modify the catalyst by forming a mixture of a magnesium halide and an aluminum halide or an alkyl aluminum compound. It is also known to modify the catalyst by reacting the catalyst with an electron donor, whereby the molecular weight distribution is improved. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,484,948 describes polyolefin catalysts modified by means of an electron
