Adobe .This article originally appeared on VICE Canada. In what many are calling the most significant ruling in gay marriage's history, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed on Thursday a lower court's ruling that the so-called Defense of Marriage Act is unconstitutional. The decision from the court means that the Department of Justice must officially recognize same-sex marriages performed in any U.S. states where they are legal as equal to traditional marriage. The decision also means the United States government will be legally obligated to recognize same-sex marriages in every state where they are legal. The decision is a major development and there's no telling how other courts will rule on the decision. However, LGBT advocates have already noted that the decision will likely have an impact on other areas of law. Last week, the U.S. Supreme Court has been deliberating on the issue of same-sex marriage in California. According to a June 7 letter from the attorney general, Eric Holder, California Attorney General Kamala Harris plans to intervene in support of the Obama Administration in several cases before the Supreme Court in order to protect the Department of Justice's stance on marriage equality in states where it's legal. While the U.S. government is legally bound by this ruling, Congress has the option of overriding it by passing a bill that would officially legalize same-sex marriage nationwide. On Friday, Democratic senators introduced the Respect for Marriage Act, which would require the Department of Justice to recognize same-sex marriages that are legal in more than half the states. Sen. Jeff Merkley told The Daily Beast on Friday that he introduced the bill "to make sure marriage equality is recognized regardless of where you live." "The Supreme Court's decision reaffirms the fundamental equality of all our families," Merkley said in a statement on Friday. "The Respect for Marriage Act will ensure that the Supreme Court's decision is honored." Sen. Tom Harkin was also pleased with the ruling. "This decision is not a surprise. It was the clear and correct conclusion given that California is a state by every
