There is an occasional magical moment when a group of sacred or improvised drummers manages to create the kind of sound (and sense of community) that can be felt in the air. There is an apparent disconnect between the drummers and the crowd, and a disconnect in how the crowd is reacting. The fact that the crowd is reacting a certain way is not an issue, but rather that the crowd doesn't seem to think to actively participate. The situation in San Francisco is starting to build. I heard about the circle on the Internet but I wasn't quite sure how to get there. I eventually found it on the street. I walked in on an improvised version of an electric bass drum pattern. There was a lot of movement at the beginning, and the crowd seemed to be reacting with some excitement. After a few minutes of music (which was improvised by the drum circle group) the crowd started to get restless, but the drummers didn't let up. The mood became casual, which meant it was the right time to leave. I met lots of wonderful drummers (including Eric Leason of the Bay Area Guitar Quartet) and I asked for their drum circle contact information. Less than an hour later I was in Santa Cruz, where I met another group of drummers. Two of them had been on my list. Both have been drumming together for over twenty years, and they practice five days a week
