But, for a moment, let's move north to a town called San Cristobal. The town has become the epicenter of the war against Maduro's regime. Are things really going that badly for the Venezuelan government? Life is peaceful in San Cristobal. But it's a quiet revolution. We spoke with a young man, Freddy, who was in that last wave of protesters into the square. He says the government isn't giving up: "It's senseless and useless to continue. ... We've already been in power for over a year. What's there left to do? We've implemented all the reforms. We've given the people constitutional protections, and the country has become more peaceful than ever. "The revolution is over, we just need to win this and then we will have peace." These kinds of statements are becoming more and more common in Venezuela, and it's consistent with the sense that the violence could soon be over. One factor driving this is an economy that is on life support from Russia and China. Venezuela is an oil-producing nation, and oil is not as important an export as it used to be. Still, Venezuela ranks as one of the wealthiest countries in Latin America, with the most natural resources. And with large debts and state-controlled oil production, it can still afford to import food. However, with the average Venezuelan paying prices for gasoline as high as $5 a gallon, it's
