In between all of the amazing gadgets of CES, we got to see some pretty cool shit: the iPhone's front and rear camera was deep in development, pre-production and demoed on stage and now it's out in real life. Images from the depths of Apple's labs show that the iPhone camera has undergone pretty serious changes over the last year. Whether we'll be using the upcoming iLens cameras or not is still an unknown at this point, but Apple says the new devices have a 12-megapixel rear and 5-megapixel front camera on the iPhone 6. Those units, photographed during testing, have the Lightning port on the left, and a standard headphone jack in the center. The bottom unit pictured has a Lightning connector on the right, and an older 3.5mm headphone jack on the bottom. What are your thoughts on the camera? Will the iPhone's new imaging technology be able to kick the hell out of what we see in the camera of the new Nexus and Motorola phones? Let us know in the poll at the top of this page. Monomeric enzyme active site models. The structures of the so-called monomeric enzymes provide an opportunity to approach the allosteric mechanism of action of proteins. These are proteins in which the sites for binding of the cofactors and ligands are normally at the domain interface. In this class of proteins the cofactors and substrates do not induce large domain motions. Since the active site is close to the domain interface, we might expect to have a reasonable idea of how the cofactors and substrates affect the structure and dynamics of the active site. Active sites are often intrinsically unstructured and, as such, are very difficult to study. Here we investigate one such system, a model of the active site of phosphoenolpyruvate carboxylase from E. coli. The structural properties of this well-characterized protein are so well understood that it is possible to make an amino acid sequence and a 3D structure that is as close as possible to the native one. The properties of the
