But depending on the particular software that you're using, you may have to do a bit of hand work. Even if you use programs that merely (and ideally) convert PDF to MIDI, it's a good idea to check the resulting PDFs to make sure they're as accurate as possible. Many newer programs do a good job of making sure that PDFs are created that are readable by all kinds of PDF reading programs, including paper music that's formatted that way. One thing that I almost always do is select the whole document -- I almost always have everything selected when I'm converting. I leave the tracking settings alone unless I'm sure that they'll be accurate and won't screw anything up. I'd also check the settings (via the File->Options menu) to make sure that you have your zoom set to 100%, and that your fonts look good (which includes font size, and also that the line spacing is kept uniform). Using programs like MusicXML generally make it a simple matter to check and correct errors that you notice.
