Statistic Newspapers will increase weekly price of blood and blood products by 10% over next month, despite NHS urging that parents should be buying from specialist centres

The price of blood and blood products is to rise by 10% from January 1 next year, in a move that has been blamed on rising costs. The extra cost - of about £120 per week per unit of blood - is due to a range of factors, including costs for the biobanking component of the service, the British Blood Transfusion Society (BBTS) said. "Despite the efforts of the National Blood Transfusion Council to reduce costs and increase the number of products available, patient access to blood products is limited and this has resulted in a small increase in the cost of buying from some distributors," said BBTS chief executive, John Rodgers. "The price of blood and blood products is now only slightly lower than it was in early 2012, with specialist hospitals buying products directly from the NHS and the NHS paying a mark-up to wholesalers." The organisation for patients and health care staff said it was disappointed by the additional price increases. NHS England says that regular infusions were going up for the first time in three years due to high levels of demand for red blood cell transfusions. Transfusion services have been under pressure since the NHS was told in 2015 that it needed to find £425m a year to fund a shortfall in the supply of blood products, caused by falling birth rates and a falling number of donors. Despite spending £30m a year on the campaign to encourage more donations, donor numbers dropped in 2015 to 1.7 million, a fall of 0.8 million from three years earlier. Last year more than 1.57 million donations were made, a drop of 0.24 million. The NHS Blood and Transplant service manages the collection and storage of blood and blood
