How to Make your Own Vaporizer on airsoap.com It works perfectly in everyone's best interest to use the latest mobile security software. You don't want any sorts of troubles to arise if you go on public Wi-Fi. Mobile security software is very crucial because many people don't think mobile security software is that much important compared to other software.Q: Why some think that this is the case? Why does double asterisk work here? Here's something I've always found confusing about the language. In most languages,  is used to unpack the first, second, third, etc. parameters in the function call. This is most often used in cases when there are more than the number of parameters specified in the function's arguments. But, it seems that in JavaScript, double asterisk could also be used to unpack the arguments. Why does this work? It seems like I could just write the following. var args = Array.prototype.slice.apply(arguments); This also seems strange, because if I pass something like "a", "b", "c", "d", "e" to the function, then all but the first argument is lost. For example, myFunction('b', "c", "d", "e") // "b" // OK, but... myFunction('b', 'c', 'd', 'e') // "b" //? A: Objects are passed by value in JavaScript, which means that objects are stored in memory at a different address than the object's identifier. double-asterisk unpack works because the unpack'd value is stored in a location where the identifier points to it. Therefore, double-asterisk does not unpack the data because when the unpack is written into the memory location at the same address the identifier points to, the original value is overwritten. The alternative is to write one of the following functions: // f1 takes the first argument and copies it to the other arguments function f1(a,...args) { args.unshift(a); } // f2 takes the first argument and pushes it to the end of the argument array function f2(a,...args) { args.push(a); } Why double-asterisk is
