El Sendero Del Chaman 191.pdf [NEW]

Felipe and Fernando, along with the rest of their community, have returned to their pre-war fishing grounds. I asked Fernando what had become of his family, and he told me that their village had been repeatedly attacked, as it was on the frontline of Sendero Luminoso attacks. In the midst of this war, the Ashaninka collectively negotiated the Memoria Historica Del Sendero Del Chaman (Ashaninka Bibliographical Memory of the Shining Path). In the course of this war, the Ashaninka learned about the repression of their culture and the disappearance of their people. This collection of narratives provided a powerful testimony of the Sendero crimes committed on the Ashaninka territories. Like many of the oral histories in Memoria Historica, and while the perpetrators will never be known, it is possible to identify the different families involved. Ashaninka oral histories are narrated with the aid of a mock Literal translation, which attempts to render the story into an imaginary indigenous idiom called Aymara. The translations are not necessarily done by the social scientist or anthropologist, but by relatives or friends who were not in the military at the time of the wars. The oral histories presented here do not identify individuals by names. However, they are presented in the context of a narrative in which the family or clan are unambiguously identified by their ethnicity, and their own partial or collective responsibility for Sendero crimes. The stories also include details about where Sendero members were found, and by whom.
