she hates herself and looks at herself in the mirror and thinks, 'can't you see? you're horrible, without even any makeup. you don't look good at all.' that's the way she thinks, and i think that her thinking is very, very clever. but her thinking is also, perhaps, a bit unnatural. because she spends so much time observing herself, she doesn't understand that what she's doing is natural to her character. it's a character trait. but in her case, it's like she's always put on a disguise. she puts on a false mask of being a nice person all the time, and then when she takes that off she feels that she's been stripped of something, and she isn't sure what she's like underneath. so that's what she wants to examine, and find out what her true feelings are, and the results are very moving. people don't normally think like that. the story of 200 pounds beauty is so simplistic and easy to get into that it might even be the best way to introduce the topic of high-low culture in japan. this is a movie about a very hard-working young japanese woman, han-na, who wants to lead a high life like her mother. it is a story of a materialistic american woman who becomes bored with american culture and wants to go back to japan. her boyfriend encourages her to go back and she does. however, the clincher is when she discovers that her mother had plastic surgery to change her looks. she thinks her mother is a monster, but she ends up loving her mother because her mother thinks she's beautiful in a different way, and she's as happy as any woman can be, regardless of the look she possesses. 5ec8ef588b
