the children's apperception test is commonly used by psychologists, teachers, and counselors in schools to better understand the behavior of children. when aida, the data analyst, started analyzing the data she found the cat as one of the most effective methods to get deep and accurate information about how young people act, react, and think about themselves. young children must be age-appropriate peers when administering the test. the entire test is designed for the on-going development of the child, and the test should not be given to a child who is judged to be physically disabled or mentally retarded. during the test, all the drawings are scored in terms of what is happening in each picture. interpretation of the drawings is done in relation to the child's developmental level. the test and the test-retest reliability were used to examine the diagnostic validity of the cat. the reliability of the cat was examined by administering the same test to 38 children, and the test-retest reliability was examined by administering the test to 20 children, who were previously examined. the findings indicated that the cat has both a high retest reliability and a high internal consistency, and that the cat effectively identifies young children's oppositional behavior. the test, which uses a pictorial format, is administered as an interview. the test is based on the theory that young children are intuitive psychologists who project their thoughts and feelings onto representations of situations and characters and then narrate the story of these pictures in their own words. the test is composed of a series of standardized situations intended to model various stages of social development. however, the reaction of the child to the confrontation with an unfamiliar situation and its significance for the child are the most important determinants of the outcome of the test. the test can be administered individually, with the child observing a trained projective tester who verbally describes the drawings to the child and who also encourages the child to tell a story about the pictures. alternatively, the test may be administered in groups in which a smaller child is observed by a group of 3 to 5 age-matched children who are encouraged to offer their own interpretations of the test situation. 5ec8ef588b
