I finally finished a portrait project, and my wife took a good number of pictures, all with her iPad. Macbeth Pro 5 was the app that finally migrated them to Lightroom for post processing, and I had no problems importing them all. They all turned out great. The iPad Pro is no slouch when it comes to portrait shots. I had to use the lighting tools in Photoshop to help with some of the less flattering lighting where the user's hand or fingers caught the flash. Photoshop also works exceptionally well on a larger screen, which is as much a blessing for an editor as a photographer. The added screen real estate made it easy to better gauge the picture composition – especially with the smaller pixel density of the iPad Pro. And it's fun to look back at some of my previous work and see the difference. While I'm never going to give up my MacBook Pro again for any laptop, the iPad Pro is more than adequate for photo work. If only organizations gave us our own portable workstations so we weren't so reliant on the cloud. The iPad Pro is a joy to work with, and I've tried an iPad 2, a Retina iPad 3, and now a new iPad Pro. In each case, it was faster with a larger screen, giving me the room to get better pictures. The Retina iPad was my first ever Apple product and Apple has done a great job of keeping up with the iPad Pro's innovations and speed. These are some of the photos got done over the weekend using my new iPad Pro. The main purpose of the iPad Pro is still photo work (which is why I'm still using a Macbook Pro) but I'm finding myself doing a lot more sketching and painting on the device. Not a bad trade off.

Adobe Photoshop CS5 includes a feature called "Smart Adjustments". This feature could automatically retouch your photo when you resized it using a "Device" panel on the left side of your screen. The panel has three tabs. Brightness, Contrast, and Sharpness. On the right side of the screen, you can see the detail of these adjustments. You need to select the option and adjust the captured picture. The magic of the smart adjustments feature is that the photo will be adjusted as your monitor or camera settings. The photo will be brightened, or make the contrast look better. Adobe Photoshop CS5 has an important feature named "Smart Erase". This is one of the reasons Photoshop is the number one photo editing software used. Sometimes the photo was taken as a blurry or with a flash, so you don't need to do a lot of editing to make it look clear. But you can accidentally make changes in the photo and even the most experienced photographer would be shocked after your editing. The feature of "Smart Erase" is a solution for that. You can erase or blur tiny portions of the photo to make it look natural. The blurs can be eliminated after some editing. The blurs can be erased by clicking and dragging it. Adobe Photoshop CS5 has Smart Sharpen. This feature can help photographers to sharpen the image by removing noise to the image. It also helps to remove grain that is added in the photo editing in Photoshop. So you can eliminate the noise from your image. For example, if you just took an image on a photo trip with a camera, the phone photo can be blurry and have some noise. You can use this feature to erase the noise in the image and get a clear and sharp image from the photo.
