From The National Interest The Australian Electoral Commission conducted a "first-past-the-post" election for the 45 seats in the House of Representatives and six seats in the Senate. Had the election taken place in a more proportional system, as was done in Ireland's landmark 1993 election, the outcome might have been quite different. In particular, the election of the Labor Party's Rudd as Prime Minister is not explainable in terms of a typical first-past-the-post election. Had the election taken place under proportional representation, it is quite plausible that the Labor Party could have ended up with fewer seats, or possibly none, in the House of Representatives, and that the Australian Labor Party would now be a marginal party in the Senate. The idea of "a typical first-past-the-post election" is vague. I am wondering whether it is possible to infer some properties of the Australia elections from the general elections in the US. From the Australian voting history, there are five 2 party contests (Labor, Liberal and National) and one 3 party contest (ALP). In the US, there are four 2 party contests (Republican, Democratic and Independent) and two 3 party contests (Democratic and Republican). Is it possible to say something about the distribution of winning percentages and seat-win percentages in each of the elections? A: In Australia, the difference between the parties has been quite constant over the past few decades. In the House of
