full sizeQ: How can I convert a single dimensional vector to a three dimensional vector? I have a very simple data structure and I'm trying to write a function that takes the dimensions of the data structure as a vector and returns a vector with each element the number of times it appears in the data structure. I know that I can do this using for-loops with a hash table. But, this seems very inefficient. I'm wondering if there's a better way. The data structure I'm working with is a vector of pointers to a data structure that looks like this: typedef struct { int A; int B; int C; int D; } ElementData; And, I'm trying to get the answer for vectors of lengths: {1, 1, 1, 1, 1, 1, 1, 1, 1, 1} {2, 2, 2, 2, 2, 2, 2, 2, 2, 2} ... {x, x, x, x, x, x, x, x, x, x} A: The first, and simplest way to handle this is just to use a vector instead of a list of pointers to ElementData: vector mydata; // fill with elements vector counts; counts.reserve(mydata.size()); for (vector::iterator i = mydata.begin(); i != mydata.end(); ++i) { counts.push_back(i->count); } There are a variety of other ways you could approach this, depending on what you're doing with the data. Using a vector means you get the benefit of vector functions like push_back and reserve, and all of the standard vector-alike functions you've been using. If you don't want to use 04aeff104c
