I picked up a copy of Photoshop CS5, after becoming disenchanted with with half a dozen other "productivity" programs on my machine, with the idea of learning the tools, in the hopes of using it for occasional projects (large or small, commercial or personal) for about 4-5 hours a day, then moving on to the next app. Like Adobe said, my anticipated learning curve was above my capabilities! I've tried to use the tools without "learning" the tools. Creating a PSD file from within the program, I pretty much have done the opposite of what I had in mind. Adobe help on this aspect was..... limited to the point of uselessness. I had to revert back to experimenting in a usability environment that was conducive to experimentation. Kudos to Adobe does to this in "Alternative Learning Environments". Give credit where credit is due!
I'm now using Brackets and on Windows is doing fine, with it's ease of use in a non product development environment, as my main application for procrastination.

In CS6, I didn't really use the presets that much. I used the "Aperture 3" preset most often, which creates and saves a combination of composite adjustments that I like from the "Aperture" library. My keywords, Lightroom's built-in presets, were practical. I preferred Lightroom III's keyword presets, which made no assumptions about the user's artistic goals. Then came CS7, which didn't even give you the keyword panel in an LR4 database.
