Most photo editing software will offer the ability to change the colour of the image you are editing and performing edits, however, sometimes you may find the ability is limited and it is necessary to have more control over the colour of elements. In this instance, it's best to adjust the colours one element at a time, concentrating on the single element's colour and lightness. You will be able to affect the colour of the current layer, all the layers below it, and all the layers beneath that. If you want to affect the Darken layers, the Lighten layers and the rest of the layers in between, select all that you want and then right-click (to the left of the mouse) on one of the layers, and select 'Colorize'. This will desaturate the colour of the selected layers and allow you to affect the colour of the rest of the layers. Use another tool to highlight the colour of your image you want to affect, such as the Selection Brush and use the sliders to fine tune the colour of your image. Finding the right sliders for the image you are editing can be extremely difficult. Use the following steps to identify the RGB colours and the corresponding HSL and HSV values for a particular image: You can see the RGB colour interpretation scheme by simply inspecting the image. To see the full colour spectrum, select the Hue/Saturation layer and scroll to the right. You can see that the primary colours in the RGB colour model are blue, green and red.
