You hold your face close to the camera, fire the shot, then uncap your selfie stick. The app then takes the front-facing camera reference, the left side of your face, and uses sophisticated face recognition software to match it to an already-tagged picture in your phone's photo library. The app then automatically replaces your face in the photo with the one it found tagged - giving you a mirror selfie. In 2006, by then an award winning portrait photographer, I was asked to teach a workshop at the Adobe Conference Centre in San Jose, California on Photoshop. I was asked to make Photoshop CS usable on an ordinary computer for the first time. I decided it could be done, and we would see how it worked out. In the same year, I was invited to a prestigious competition to make 1D digital RAW files of diamonds, contributions to which were sold to the highest bidder. I was told that my images would be viewed by two betin accredited jewellers, but knew nothing about it. I only worked on the project as a support person. The images were judged, and after a very long period of waiting, in the end, there was only one judge, and she turned out to be one of the two jewellers. But she didn't know it. After that, other contests where I won and was invited to show at exhibitions, also used my images having seen them in online galleries at my website. I was considered a 'professional photographer' and my work was no longer just toys. And yet there was nothing I had tried to promote myself as, no book, no course of study, no website, no webinars, no WebEx, no Photoshop personal site, or even course materials. I was living outside of the digital world.

But for anyone who has bought Photoshop since the early days, getting a software that won’t crash is a great way to start your Creative Cloud experience off.
