Unfortunately, Lightroom 5 does not include any new image editor tools. In fact, it doesn't seem to provide any basic ability to retouch images beyond the usual images editing tools in the main menu. It can throw up a dialog asking if the user would like to retouch images, but this is useless unless you know the software you are using well enough to recognize the best tools. Having reliable and consistent quality is a must-have for any web application. Inspired by our Innovation team, we have spent months adding new features to our software discovery and selection service in order to give our community real-time tools to help them find the exact software they need to power their web applications and solutions. Here's a quick rundown of the new features in this release: It's also worth noting that I am now on the CQure team, and I'll work on the development of the next release and this year's CQure Vision. This means that I'll be listening closely to our community and users. While it's not my decision, I will take feedback from the community to heart and work on improving our software's discovery and selection service, so that we can teach the world how to find the software they need for their web applications. What follows are some detailed and particularly interesting features. For example, you can now have automatic culling and keep only the best or most interesting subject in your images— a boon to serious photographers and the web market alike. The way this feature works is to measure the number of objects in the image and determine if the composition is good enough to view online. If it is, Adobe will offer it for download or it may offer it to other websites. Lastly, for other photographers who use smartphone cameras, your photos can be automatically culled and uploaded for you to view in the cloud. Other new options include new Filters for imagining how an image would look if you could alter the lighting, enhancements and corrections using the built-in features in Lightroom. One interesting change is that if you use the +3 Exposure compensation adjustment in the Develop module, the original exposure is retained. This is an excellent idea for web galleries that offer the ability filter your image using Lightroom, but also retain the original image.
