If you've been paying attention, you know there is a tree-house, and a pond, and some beautiful flowers and a scenic setting. Adobe Sensei is clearly a powerful tool. It is however important to remember that this AI answers broad questions about images. As such, it is not able to pass judgement on the quality of the image or whether it is likely to sell, for instance. But it does a very good job at creating templates from which applications can be built. Lightroom is already off to a great start with this. The current application of new templates for filters is a clear indication of how everything is fantastic. It is easy, fast, and more importantly, better. The new Radial Filter is a great example of this. I have been using it to change the contrast and desaturate the blacks. It even allows for the exposure to be changed in certain parts of the photo. When it comes to artificial intelligence finally working out what kind of pictures sell, we will see some real progress. As things stand right now, I am sure that people will begin to ask themselves if so-called automatic buying is even possible. (If anything, an example of how you might use AI in a real world context is Adobe's update of Photoshop has fallen into the hands of many of Pee-Wee's guys, because they are working on new versions and features that may make it into the next release: creative Cloud. This version is very good keeping in mind that it does away with the long-insecure and slow way of working with files, through actions. There are drag-and-drop operations that bring each layer into an image as a separate object. Layers are kept easily accessible in the library, and each layer can be moved or grouped with its neighbors. Perhaps most importantly, version 5 still keeps all the very best features of Photoshop from its first release. The user interface has also been kept beautifully streamlined. It, again, retains its ability to handle large, complex projects.
